Seen in the Washington Shops

BY ELENORE DE WITT EBY.

Spring millinery probably holds more interest for fashion lovers at present than any other item of feminine apparel. New straws, soft and silken in texture, have made their debut in the local shop windows, and two particularly beautiful colors are being used for the first time in the advance models for the approaching season.

One of the shades, which hovers between blue and lavender, is termed "cornflower," although the name does not adequately describe it, and the "The afternoon sown illustrated."

The satin bodice is simply cut to include wide shoulder straps, while to include with cording. The satin foundation, over which is a short satin foundation, over which is a longer gathered tunio of green chiffon wilder in tunio of green chiffon

Ribbon turbans also strike a new note in millinery and give promise of attaining unusual popularity this spring. The favored medium is plaid unostentatious trimming is added in the form of a long tassel. The close-ly fitting turban foundation is of golden brown straw and the tassel is composed of slik braid strands of the same shade. The slik, which is Alice blue with light stripes of brown and white crossing it, is out in petal-like folds which almost entirely cover the crown, the points meeting at its top. rown, the points meeting at its top, but there are glimpses of brown straw between the ribbon petals. The braid tassel is so long that it falls much lower than the shoulder, glying youthful as well as smart touch to the ensemble.

The dainty little evening frock pictured is of palest Nile green chiffon and satin, with fluffy billows of tulle and lace, which make it almost as light and ophameral as seaform ita final touch of beauty to the creation.

The afternoon gown illustrated, which is of brown silk crepe, combines several of the latest fashlon dictates. First of all, it is trimmed with accordion pleating, which is returning to favor and will probably be widely used during the coming season. Secondly, the skirt is fiared at the lower edge with rows of cording, rather than at the hips, and, thirdly, the blouse is covered with all-over embroidery in blue, green and gold, which give the effect of an entirely different fabric. The girdle is of gold cleth, to accentuate that note in the embroidery, and two large gold filigree ornaments set with greet stones and differing in size and shape furnish an odd note of trimming. The pleating is added in the form of long cuffs for the mandarin sleeves and panels at each side of the blouse front.

When Pockets Return.

We have become so accustomed to carry our purses and handkerchiefs and similar small accessories in handbags that we are prone to overlook the fact that whole decades and more have passed in the history of feminine costumery when handbags were an almost unknown article of a woman's equipment. Whether or not we carry handbags at all seems to depend on handbags at all seems to depend on one thing—whèther or not skirts are full enough to permit pockets large enough to serve the purpose.

A German writer of a generation ago, commenting on the style of the directoire and empire period, says:
"As there was no under-petticoat, and as dresses were without pockets, the ladies would have been obliged to carry their odds and ends in their hands, if they had not preferred to take them about with them in a reticule. Since the antiquarians had stated as a fact that the Athenian ladies made use of similar bags, the Parisians were reconciled to doing so."

Economical Soups.

The objective of the thrifty house-wife in making soup is to make it for nothing. She ought to aim to for nothing. She ought to aim to have soup once every day, and almost always to have it without adding materially to her food budget.

When a boarding-house keeper or institutional director computes the cost of soup she has to take into consideration the cost in time taken to plan and serve an additional course, but the housewife need not consider this in planning soup every day in winter.

Make It Pay.

One way to minimize the soup cost is to make soup meat or a soup bone pay for itself. This is possible by making sure that you get good fresh meat and then by using this meat to make some sort of cookedover meat dish that will take the place in a meal of any additional meat. When you have cooked the soup meat drain off the liquid and soup meat, drain off the liquid and set the meat aside to cool. Then remove the bone, gristle and skin or fat and put the meat through the grinder. It is better always to grind ieral as ceafoam it- manner for pancakes.
